Duck

Duck meat is a good source of protein, phosphorus, iron, potassium and vitamins from the B group. However, it contains more fat than chicken meat and is more calorific (240 kcal per 100g of duck meat). It is due to this fact that fatty ducks should e.g. be poured over with plenty of water during roasting, so that they could bake in their own fat after the water has evaporated. Duck gives you plenty of options: it can be roasted, fried, cooked or stewed.

Frozen carcass of Barbarie duck, Fresh carcass of Barbarie duck, Deep frozen fillet of Barbarie duck, Deep frozen breast of Barbarie duck, Deep frozen leg of Barbarie duck, Frozen carcass of Pekin duck, Fresh carcass of Pekin duck, Deep frozen fillet of Pekin duck, Deep frozen leg of Pekin duck, Giblets: Liver of duck, Heart of duck;

Goose

According to the National Poultry Council, goose meat is exceptionally healthy, since it has a very high content of protein, iron and vitamins from A, B and E groups. Although goose is not a lean meat, the fat composition contained in it is much more beneficial than the one in pork. This is due to the fact that there are mono- and polyunsaturated fatty acids in goose fat, which are believed to be the healthiest type.

Guinea Fowl

Guinea Fowl meat is an extremely precious kind of poultry, recognised mainly for its refined game taste and extraordinary nutritional benefits. It is a very delicate and juicy meat with a small fat content. Guinea Fowl meat is almost twice leaner than that of chicken (the fat content of leg meat is ca. 2.7 per cent and of breast meat 1.1 per cent). This means that it is the leanest among all species of poultry!
